“Snapshot of a Dog” by James Thurber

I ran across a dim photograph of him the other day. He's been dead 25 years. His name was Rex (my two brothers and I named him) and he was a bull terrier. "An American bull terrier," we used to say, proudly; none or your English bulls. He had one brindle eye that sometimes made him look like a clown and sometimes reminded you of a politician with derby hat and cigar. The rest of him was white except for a brindle saddle and a brindle stocking on a hind leg. Nevertheless, there was a nobility about him. He was big and muscular and beautifully made. He never lost his dignity even when trying to accomplish the extravagant tasks my brother and I used to set for him.

One of these was the bringing of a ten-foot wooden rail into the yard through the back gate. We would throw it out into the alley and tell him to get it. Rex was as powerful as a wrestler, and he would catch the rail at the balance, lift it clear of the ground, and trot with great confidence toward the gate. Of course, the gate being only four feet wide, he couldn't bring the rail in broadside. He found that out when he got a few terrific jolts, but he wouldn't give up. He finally figured out how to do it, by dragging the rail, holding onto one end, growling. He got a great, wagging satisfaction out of his work.

He was a tremendous fighter, but he never started fights. He never went for a dog's throat but for one of its ears (that teaches a dog a lesson), and he would get his grip, close his eyes, and hold on. He could hold on for hours. His longest fight lasted from dusk to almost pitch-dark, one Sunday. It was fought with a large, snarly nondescript belonging to a large colored man. When Rex finally got his ear grip, the brief whirlwind of snarling turned to screeching. It was frightening to listen to and to watch. The Negro boldly picked the dogs up, swung them around his head, and finally let them fly like a hammer in a hammer throw, but although they landed ten feet away, with a great plump, Rex still held on. Working their way to the middle of the car tracks, two or three streetcars were held up by the fight. A motorman tried to pry Rex's jaws open with a switch rod; somebody lighted a stick and held it to Rex's tail but he paid no attention. Rex's joy of battle, when battle was joined, was almost tranquil. He had a kind of pleasant expression during fights, his eyes closed in what would of seemed to be sleep had it not been for the turmoil of the struggle. The Fire Department finally had to be sent for and a powerful stream of water turned on the dogs for several moments before Rex finally let go.

The story of that Homeric fight got all around town, and some of our relatives considered it a blot on the family name. They insisted we get rid of Rex, but nobody could have made us give him up. We would have left town with him first, along any road there was to go. It would have been different, perhaps, if he'd ever started fights, or looked for trouble. But he had a gentle disposition. He never bit a person in the ten strenuous years that he lived, nor ever growled at anyone except prowlers. He killed cats, that is true, but quickly and neatly without especial malice, the way men kill certain animals.

It was the only thing he did that we could never cure him of doing. It would have been different, perhaps, if he had ever looked for trouble. But he had a gentle disposition. He never bit a person in the ten strenuous years that he lived, nor ever growled at anyone except prowlers.
Swimming was his favorite recreation. The first time he ever saw a body of water, he trotted nervously along the steep bank for a while, fell to barking wildly, and finally plunged in from a height of eight feet or more. I shall always remember that shining, virgin dive. Then he swam upstream and back just for the pleasure of it, like a man. It was fun to see him battle upstream against a stiff current, growling every foot of the way. He had as much fun in the water as any person I have ever known. You didn't have to throw a stick into the water to get him to go in. Of course, he would bring back a stick if you did throw one in. He would have brought back a piano if you had thrown one in.

That reminds me of the night he went a-roving in the light of the moon and brought back a small chest of draws he had found somewhere—how far from the house nobody ever knew. There were no draws in the chest when he got it home, and it wasn't a good one—just an old cheap piece abandoned on a trash heap. Still it was something he wanted, probably because it presented a nice problem in transportation. We first knew about his achievement when, deep in the night, we heard sounds as if two or three people were trying to tear the house down. We came downstairs and turned on the porch light. Rex was on the top step, trying to pull the thing up, but it had caught and he was just holding his own. I suppose he would have held his own until dawn if we hadn't helped him. Next day we carted the chest miles away and threw it out. If we had thrown it out nearby, he would have brought it home again, as a small token of his integrity in such matters.

There was in his world no such thing as the impossible. Even death couldn't beat him down. He died, it is true, but only, as one of his admirers said, after "straight-arming the death angel" for more than an hour. Late one afternoon he wandered home, too slowly and uncertainly to be the Rex that had trotted briskly homeward up our avenue for ten years. I think we all knew when he came through the gate that he was dying. He had apparently taken a terrible beating, probably from the owner of some dog he had got into a fight with. His head and body were scarred, and some of the brass studs of his heavy collar were sprung loose. He licked at our hands and, staggering, fell, but got up again. We could see that he was looking for someone. One of his three masters was not home. He did not get home for an hour. During that hour the bull terrier fought against death as he had fought against the cold, strong current of the creek. When the person he was waiting for did come through the gate, whistling, ceasing to whistle, Rex walked a few wobbly paces toward him, touched his hand with his muzzle, and fell down again. This time he didn't get up.

http://archives.newyorker.com/?i=1935-03-09#folio=015

Each of the underlined words below has also been underlined in the selection. Re-read those passages in which the underlined words appear, and then use context clues to help you select an answer. On the line provided, write the letter of the word or words that best complete each sentence.

______ 1. If a character says “a poem is a tranquil planet,” the poem is —
   A vicious     B peaceful     C agitated     D tired
2. If a character exclaims, “Strenuous activity is heaven!” the activity is —
   A chaotic and frenzied       B violent and painful
   C easy and enjoyable        D straining and tough

3. If a character remarks that “malice is like a dark spot on the sun,” the dark spot on the sun is similar to —
   A meanness       B effort        C pleasure       D planning

4. If a narrator claims, “the abandoned beach is sadness,” the beach is —
   A deserted       B incomplete     C broken         D worn out

5. If a character states, “integrity is like a good dog,” the dog is —
   A brave and patient   B violent and cruel
   C strong but dishonest D honest and devoted

On the line provided, write the letter of the best answer to each of the following items.

6. Why does Rex go for a dog’s ear rather than its throat when he gets in a fight?
   A He doesn’t know any better.
   B He wants to teach the other dog a lesson, not kill it.
   C He isn’t strong enough to go for the throat.
   D He finds ears to be an easier target.

7. Why do the relatives want the family to get rid of Rex?
   A He is too dangerous to be around children.
   B He starts too many dogfights.
   C The relatives are embarrassed by Rex’s behavior.
   D He kills too many cats.

8. Which of the following is the best reason for Rex’s refusal to chase cars or wagons?
   A He’s preoccupied with squirrels.
   B He would rather sleep than chase cars or wagons.
   C He seems to like cars and wagons.
   D He knows he can’t do anything with them.

9. Why does Rex get nervous and start barking before jumping into the creek for the first time?
   A He is afraid of the water.
   B He is afraid the water will hurt his masters.
   C He really wants to go in, but he is also a little afraid of the water.
   D He is telling his masters to throw him a stick to fetch.
10. Upon bringing the chest home, Rex feels —
   A proud      B guilty      C sad      D ready to fight

11. Rex seems to enjoy a good struggle. Which of the following situations do you think provides the most fun for Rex? On the line provided, write the letter of your answer. Then, write a paragraph that defends your choice. There is more than one possible answer. Support your thoughts with at least two examples from the selection.
   A the dogfight      B swimming
   C being discussed by relatives      D dragging the chest home

12. Imagine that in a yard that Rex passes by from time to time he comes upon a realistic, life-size model dog. Based on what you know of Rex from Snapshot of a Dog, what do you predict he would do? Why? Write your prediction in a paragraph in the space provided. Include details from the selection to support your prediction.